A letter from their Excellencies

Dearest Dreiburgen,

We have returned from Great Western War, where Dreiburgen fielded a fierce contingent of rapier fighters, and the great baronial heraldry of Dreiburgen was seen on the heavies battlefield as well. Thank you for all the work you put into creating a baronial encampment that could be mistaken for no other. Our torches blazed, our colors flew against a clear blue sky, and the canvas walls featuring baronial colors and personal heraldry shouted from out of the desert reaches and mountains high that "DREIBURGEN IS HERE!" Thank you for rallying behind us, working beside us, and standing to defend what is precious to us all.

A year has already passed since we were invested as your Baron and Baroness. The weight of the coronets is lessened by all of your support. You make this barony a fun, exciting, and enterprising place to play. Everywhere we look, connections are being made, and empowered individuals are making The Dream manifest.

The calendar is full of events at home, and many afar, and we look forward to spending those days in your company.

Yours In Service

Baron Ramvoldus and Baroness Kungund

The Bellicose and Belligerent Barony of Dreiburgen

By Thegn Eadwynne of Runedun

(Author's note: Much of this history is from my personal perspective. It's the only perspective I have. Other people will no doubt have other perspectives with other stories to tell. I hope to hear them.)

When one thinks of War, one usually thinks of the Barony of Calafia with their many war bands and their annual Potrero War. Or perhaps the Shire of Al-Sahid with their Highland Wars. Al-Sahid, I should note, was originally a Canton of Dreiburgen. Fewer people think of Barony of Dreiburgen when they think of War, but they should. The very foundation of the Barony of Dreiburgen was founded upon War. The first event in the area now called Dreiburgen was on April 22 - 23, AS VI (1972), and called the "Overnight Tourney" by the Barony of Angels. It was held in Black Mountain Park on Mount San Jacinto, in Riverside County near the town of Idyllwild. Not only was it a War of armored combatants, but it also had a "War of Roses and Thistles" – a battle between the sexes using pillows. (Silly events near Idyllwild are not a new thing to us).

On Saturday and Sunday, Apr 20 - 21, AS VIII (1974), the Baronies of the Calafia, Angels, Dreiburgen, and the Isles held a Tourney of Union, in anticipation of forming the Principality of Caid, at Glen Helen Regional Park in Devore, in Dreiburgen. Little did the Kingdom of the West realize the trouble this would cause. Within a few short years, Dreiburgen's bellicose soul was evident in our participation in the Principality of CAID's first and second Rebellions against our parent Kingdom of the West (Apr 26, AS IX (1975), and May 15, AS XI (1976)). There remains a song, of which this is the first verse: The Caid Rebellion; Tune: Battle Hymn of the Republic:

*Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Prince,

*He is marching out his warriors as the Western soldiers wince,

*They're lining up for battle and all CAID's convinced,

*CAID shall rule this day.

On 29 Apr 1978 - 3 Jun 1978 (A.S. XII-XIII), Caid became a Kingdom. The King and Queen of the West, Gregory of York and Bevin Fraser of Stirling had residence in Caid, and were thus issued Green Cards by Caid to allow them to remain. This allowed us to remain friendly with the Kingdom of the West, since we held their King and Queen hostage. But, the greedy eyes of the Kingdom of Atenveldt looked towards us and they thought they saw an opportunity to advance their realm towards the ocean. The Atens descended upon Dreiburgen on Oct. 20, 21 & 22, AS XIII (1978), at Glen Helen Regional Park.

This was my first war. Although I wasn't squired to Dreiburgen Baron Sir Waldt von Markheim yet, he had already taken me under his wing and got me armored up and fighting. His lady, Alison, recruited me for War Gate duties and general camp help. This was the largest gathering of SCA folk I had ever seen. I was used to a fairly crude armor up until then and there I saw some museum quality stuff which generated an ambition for better quality gear. I didn't really have my own armor at the time, so I was borrowing the baronial chain mail which was made for a much smaller man. It took three people to pull it onto me, and one of them asked me to tell them later, "what it was like to sleep in mail," because they didn't think they could get me back out. Waldt had armed me with a spear, which was an uncommon weapon at the time. I was attached to the small Dreiburgen fighting unit. Several folks, including later Baron Leo de Coronado formed our front shield wall. Waldt and I were behind them, me with a spear, and him with a mace. At one point in the battle our defensive wall split apart leaving a whole plethora of White belts and other fighters from the other side right in front of me. I admit, I froze for a moment. Then Waldt in his ever calm voice said, "Edvin, kill someone, won't you?" That woke me up and I started strike after strike from about nine feet back. Not being used to spears yet, the opposing fighters were unprepared for my assault and they went down one after another. Waldt told me later that I had killed nine in a row. I had no idea what I did since I had gone into survival mode. In a later scenario, I recall King Armand de Seigny asking for volunteers to take a hill on which the opposing army had entrenched themselves. We outnumbered them, so to give them an honorable fighting chance, he wanted to limit our assault to similar numbers. I ended up getting specifically picked by him. I don't know whether it was because I was a spearman or whether it was because I was in the Baronial chain mail (he wore mail cap-à-pie). I felt so honored that I was on a cloud the rest of the war. We did really well on that hill too. Oh, I did eventually get out of the borrowed chain mail. Lastly, I should also note, the Dreiburgen Cooks and Brewers' Guild was of great logistical support for the Dreiburgen forces.

For the next few years, Dreiburgen joined in Caid's assaults on Atenveldt in what was called, the Burro Creek wars. But they did make one more advance into Dreiburgen, notably in 30-31 of August, AS XV (1980) in Redlands. The Kingdom of the West, no doubt hoping to regain some of its lost southern territories, joined the Atens in their attack. Dreiburgen Baron Leo de Coronado called on the Kingdom of Caid for assistance and received it. According to the Event Steward, Sir Theodric Pendar of Faulconwood, the war was fought to a draw, but no treaty was signed, and the armies of the West and of Atenveldt returned home. Together with Baron Leo, Adrian Buchanon (later becoming both a Knight and Duke) was instrumental in Dreiburgen's defenses and logistics.

Realizing that Dreiburgen was still open to assault, Baron Leo and Sir Theodric began encouraging both heavy fighting and archery. The skills of Archery grew strong and Dreiburgen hosted Caid's sixth Kingdom Archery Tournament in AS XVI (1982). Cavalry was also needed and so by the following year, in AS XVII (1983), Dreiburgen hosted Caid's first Kingdom Equestrian Event. The Dreiburgen Armory, founded by our founding Baron, Waldt, was enlarged and grew strong under my household, Drachenstern. A Siegecrafters' Guild, later called the Dreiburgen Engineers' Company, was founded by Gunnar Redbeard. Much later, our archery technology was significantly improved by Morgan Fellwalker whose specialty was crossbows, and by the Dreiburgen Canton of Mons Draconis which invited archery specialists to show us how to make things such as arrows and bow strings. I participated in several of these events, forging bodkin points for home made and hand-fletched arrows made at these events.

As Dreiburgen's power and influence grew within the Kingdom, it was inevitable that certain envies would emerge from other territories. On the 7th of April, there was a war between Isles and Dreiburgen. The Isles' pretext was the accusation that Dreiburgen had "fouly and untimely sundered from our midst a lovely maiden." Knowing that they could not assault so great a Barony as Dreiburgen alone, they made an open call to arms to the entire Kingdom of Caid, saying, "But, being a small Shire, we need your help in our noble aim. For who can say where their covetous eyes might turn next. No Shire or Barony will be safe for long. Let us those who would, aid us against the infidels for their lady's honour and greater glory of God and come to the Memorial Park of the Veterans in the Right good Barony of Altavia on April 7th." This, of course, pulled The Barony of Altavia into the fray. Leo, Baron of Dreiburgen, taking notice of this, was also aware that the Baron of Altavia held ancestral holdings in Dreiburgen. In kindly fashion, Leo wrote: "The Baron of Altavia has enjoyed his rightfully inherited property for many happy years and we do not dispute his right. However, we do demand our right to TOLL, and insist upon prompt remittance of same."

But Dreiburgen and Caid's conflict with Atenveldt was far from over. Caid, with a push from my own Household, Drachenstern, established a foothold in Aten territory. Elgil Mardil of Dor-Mallos, later a Dreiburgen seneschal, and Malcolm Alberic, later Baron of Dreiburgen, were highly involved. The two resulting wars were called the Great Desert Wars. Due to the rather primitive (cold/hot, windy, sandy, and dry) location, some gentlefolk nicknamed the wars, the "Catbox Wars." Obviously, no one in Dreiburgen would use such a slur on an event in which Dreiburgen was so heavily invested.

Within a few short years, the Barony of Angels attempted an assault on our Good Barony, on the 7th of September, AS XX (1985). The border of the two Baronies was a matter of dispute, and the battle was held in the Barony of Gyldenholt in Irvine Regional Park, chosen as a neutral site. Nevertheless, Gyldenholt and many others chose to involve themselves in the combat. It has been said that this border dispute was one of the principle causes of the creation of the Shire of Heatherwine (now sadly defunct) as a buffer zone about the time Caid became a Kingdom. Dreiburgen enjoyed a time of internal peace, while supporting Caid's wars outside the Kingdom, in the West, Atenveldt and as far away as An Tir. Dreiburgen was continually working on its preparedness, with Thomas Danlar leading the way. Thomas was holding practices in Redlands and inviting noteworthy trainers to come out. We learned advanced pole weapon techniques and the use of Fire Teams of three to five persons. This proved to be a highly adaptable organizational strategy which Dreiburgen used to great effect in Wars both local and in other Kingdoms.

In an attempt to professionalize its army, Caid established a Brigade System. The Levies of Dreiburgen were assigned to the Vth Brigade, first under Brigade Commander, Sir Edward Ian Anderson. Later, Duncan Brock of Greyfeather from Dreiburgen took over and after that our own Dreiburgen Baron Sir Thurstan de Barri held the position. Under Baron Thurstan's leadership, strong ties to the forces of others in the Brigade were forged, especially with the Barony of Starkhafn. During this time, Dreiburgen itself was challenged by Shire of the Burning Sands in Atenveldt over the Eastern-most portion of the Barony of Dreiburgen (Blythe). They wrote, in part: "Greetings! For many seasons now we have been ranging in untenanted land to our West. We are a poor shire and far from the common commerce centers. To eke out our subsistence, we have foraged, unwittingly at first, into your Kingdom. These regions, mundanely known as Winterhaven and Blythe, have yielded bounty to us and we find these lands fair. As we have met with no resistance, we have claimed them for our own." This challenge was answered by Dreiburgen at the Estrella War in AS XXX (1996). Dreiburgen Baron and Baroness, Thurstan and Allaine, were responsible for the lands in question since Blythe, CA, was part of the Barony of Dreiburgen. From what Baron Thurstan told me, he did not feel that Dreiburgen could support the area as well as the Shire of Burning Sands could, and so he was willing to give it up... but not without a fight. With the approval of Caid's King John II, Dreiburgen fought valiantly and virtually alone against the onslaught of the Army of the Kingdom of Atenveldt. As the battle ended and I laid sprawled on the ground with my Baronial comrades, my thought was, "This was a good day to die."

While Dreiburgen was part of the Vth Brigade, we had knights and their households living within the Barony, but they tended to fight as their own units, attaching themselves to the army as need be. As of this writing, the last Brigade Commander from Dreiburgen was Duke Edward Senestre who stepped down in XLIV (2009).

Of all the wars for which the Barony of Dreiburgen is most famous, the Great Western War stands out. Caid was doing well against Atenveldt at the Estrella wars. Too well, apparently, and the Atens tried to ban combat archery - something Dreiburgen was noted for. There was no compromise offered, so Caid decided that we would fight War on our own terms. A suitable site within the Kingdom was sought. Master Giles, being one of those on that committee asked me as a "local" to check out Prado Park. I was living in Gallavally, a Canton of Dreiburgen many miles from the site, but those outside the Barony seldom realize how vast are our vistas. But I agreed. It may surprise you to know that I did not recommend Prado. It was a good size, good fields for combat, improved and unimproved camping areas, and most importantly, showers AND washing machines. What could possibly be wrong with it? Well, first, it was in a flood plane and the land was known to turn to mud the consistency of oatmeal in the rain - and the War was scheduled for Dreiburgen's rainy season in February. The site was surrounded by cows... many, many cows... and all that means. It also had little parking space unless much of the area covered in brush was cut down. Despite my concerns, Prado was deemed the best option.

Three Dreiburgundians were on the staff of Great Western War I: Master Damales who ran the Equestrian events; and myself and Timothy Kyle who mapped out the site and marked out the first roads. While I was marking out the roads at the site, the Calafian Romans asked if they could help. Who knew roads better than Romans? I agreed with much thanks. I forgot, however, how much Romans like to expand their territory. Let's just say that they took some liberties with the map when putting in their section of roads. But the GWWI went wonderfully. Not all went quite as smoothly in every War. GWWIII, for instance was called the Great Wet War. Everything I had warned of happened. Merchants put down rugs in their stalls to keep people out of the mud, only to see the rugs float away. Pavilions were caught by wind and ripped to shreds. But Caid is resilient. Although many people's vehicles were stuck axle deep in mud, many more people came to help. At one point a large motorhome was lifted by 20 people per side where it was finally able to make it safely out. GWWIV was moved to October. This seemed the perfect fix. The war remained in Dreiburgen through GWWIX, but due to mundane construction, it was moved out of the Barony to the Barony of Wintermist where it has been since. Think not that Dreiburgen abandoned war, however. We not only continued to send troops, but also volunteered. As of this writing, the Barony of Dreiburgen has held the banner for most volunteer hours at GWW for seven years.

Although the Barony of Dreiburgen has seen an era of internal peace for some time now, one never knows when war may again threaten our borders. We must forever remain vigilant and practiced. Our armory is in full swing under Ivar Krigsvin, my old compatriot from House Drachenster. We have a Culinary Guild who can help supply logistics. Combat practices are recovering after the recent Plague. We will be ready.

Brewing Corner:

Anise Soda

By: Yngvildur in Írska

This item did not exist in Period but is inspired by the importance of Anise in period. During Biblical anise was so valuable that it was sometimes used as a form of currency for tithes, offerings and payment of taxes in Palestine. The Romans also used it for both culinary and medicinal purposes using it to flavor cakes that were eaten at the end of large feast to avoid indigestion and flatulence. Famous Greek and Roman authors such as Pliny the Elder and Paladus wrote about the cultivation and use of this spice. Charlemagne (9th century) commanded it be grown in the imperial farms. Since this spice was so valuable it is likely that only the wealthy would have used it.

I first made this soda intending to make soda for Mons Draconis Anniversary, a rootbeer with a couple spices added (star anise and cardamom). However, once I had all the dry ingredients measured and combined I discovered that I was out of root beer extract. Since I already had most of the ingredients ready I decided to try making soda with the ingredients I had on hand, which included the ingredients in the recipe below plus the addition of vanilla extract. I have since made 2 more 2.5 gallon batches of this soda, both times forgetting the addition of the vanilla extract. However, I do not miss this addition which makes the soda almost rootbeer-like in flavor. I find this version of the soda a little lighter and more refreshing, which I find perfect for hot summer days. I also chose to use star anise (which is grown in SE Asia) for its milder, sweeter flavor as compared to anise seed (which was grown in Period Europe). This addition of cardamom was purely experimental, but has remained in all batches since.

Method:

Ingredients

- 3.25 cups dark brown sugar
- 2 cups white cane sugar
- 1 oz star anise pods
- 12 green cardamom pods

Recipe

1. Dissolve sugars and add spices to 1 gallon of water
2. Bring to boil and boil for ~5 minutes
3. Let cool for ~1 hr
4. Add mixture to bottling bucket along with ~1.5 gallons water (enough to make 2.5 gallons) and ½ packet of Champagne yeast.
5. Bottle and cap.
6. Leave bottles at room temperature (~80 F) for ~48 hours.
7. Refrigerate.
